Excerpt

As they waited for the elevator, the brothers seemed to grow restless with each second that passed, swaying as if their skin was growing too tight for their frames.

“Did you have to pick a location that was so crowded?” Ethan asked with a hint of strain in his voice.

“It’s convenient, and more private than you think.” She entered the elevator as the doors opened and paused with her fingers hovering over the button for the fourth floor. “Are you getting too many thoughts from the people here?”

“It’s normally not so bad,” he said and dug his fingers into the back of his neck. “But these are not normal people. Do you have any idea what is going on in that nightclub?”

“I’ve heard things,” she replied. Tales of the sexcapades that happened on the upper floor were legendary.

“Whatever you’ve heard pales in comparison to what’s actually going on.” Ronan shifted his feet and stood with his hands covering his groin. “There are some seriously naughty, dirty people upstairs.”

Jameson sucked in a laugh as a bit of guilt made her chest tight.

She hadn’t thought about how the lust-filled thoughts of a couple hundred people might affect a telepath. As it was, the brothers both looked as if they had front-row center seats to the sexy action. Sweat had broken out on their foreheads and their cheeks were flushed a becoming pink. If Ronan had his teeth clenched any tighter, the muscles in his jaw were going to burst out of his skin.

Seeing the two of them turned on was hot, so hot that Jameson felt the lick of heat herself deep in her belly as she wondered if that was how they looked in full-out sexual congress.

No, sis, the angel on her shoulder warned. You don’t want to know that.

Why not? A girl can fantasize, right?

Sure. But not them. They’ll learn things about you no one else will know. Not even yourself.

True. Too true. Thank you, angel, for keeping me focused.

You’re going to take a long bath tomorrow, aren’t you?

Maybe. Probably. Odds are rolling in that favor.
